Market Beaters

By VITO J. RACANELLI

For our fourth consecutive contest, the average broker's stock-focus list topped the S&P 500. Winners: BofA Merrill, Wedbush, McAdams Wright, Morgan Keegan.

Propelled by a powerful bull market that has lasted almost two years, Wall Street's brokers continue to flex their muscles in the Barron's-Zack's semiannual stock-picking competition.

For the fourth contest in a row, stretching back to the end of 2008, the average return of the brokerage focus lists—or best-stock-ideas list—has trounced that of the S&P 500 over six months, one year, three years and five years.

Yes, there has been a monster rally since the March 2009 lows. But our winners brought more to the investment table than mere beta.

John Tomac for Barron's

Beta is the generally salutary effect that advancing markets have on individual stock prices—basically, the rising-tide-lifts-all-boats phenomenon. However, in 2010, when small-capitalization stocks were much in favor among investors globally, Bank of America Merrill Lynch (ticker: BAC) still took the gold for the six months through Dec. 31, with a 31.6% return, even though its U.S. 1 List, as its focus list is dubbed, was stuffed with lots of large-caps.

Nipping closely at BofA ML's heels over that stretch was Raymond James Financial (RJF), which turned in a 30.9% gain. The Tampa-based brokerage outfit, whose focus list had been a laggard in earlier contests, seems to be on the comeback trail.

Some other brokers took advantage of the market's three big dips last year—in February, July and August—to produce stellar one-year numbers. Several traded around the same stock names, seeking to sell them near highs and to buy them back near lows.

For all of 2010, Los Angeles-based Wedbush Securities finished first, up from third place last time, with a 36% return. It was followed by New Constructs, which advanced almost 27%. The small Tennessee-based research outfit has often been at or near the top of our polls. (For more on the company's views on stocks, see ETF Focus.)

Over three years, Seattle-based McAdams Wright Ragen topped the pack, with a nearly 15% return, improving from second place last time.

MORGAN KEEGAN, a regional broker that has been a perennial powerhouse in our contest, took second in the three-year competition and again won the five-year race, going away, with a 33% return. The Memphis-based regional broker has effectively owned that prestigious piece of real estate since late 2008.

What is it about Tennessee and good performance?

Goldman Sachs (GS), which also sports an impressive long-term record, was runner-up over five years, with a nearly 23% return.

The cellar dwellers in the respective periods measured were Credit Suisse (CS), Wells Fargo Advisors, (WFC) Morgan Stanley (MS) and Raymond James (RJF).

Every six months, Barron's ranks the top stock picks of a number of U.S. brokers. This time, a dozen participated in our rankings.

Winning Ways

Some of the leaders on these lists focused on sectors, such as industrials, energy, materials and consumer discretionary, prospered by trading in and out of certain stocks as they rose and fell. And some benefited by making big bets on a few.

Some of the contestants, such as Charles Schwab (SCHW), are well-known to the average investor. But others, such as McAdams Wright, aren't. Chicago-based Zacks Investment Research does the math for us, by compiling the data and then keeping a running tally of each focus list, or best stock ideas, for various periods over the past five years. (For a more detailed description of the methodology, see related story.)

Certain sectors particularly helped or hindered the performance of the focus lists. Last year, it paid to have big dollops of industrials, materials, energy stocks and consumer-discretionary issues, like those linked to retailing. Energy shares aided Raymond James and Goldman Sachs, while health-care stocks, with some exceptions, took a bite out of the performance of the brokerages that finished near the bottom, according to Zacks analyst Tracey Ryniec.

A lack of utilities companies, a laggard group last year, contributed to the winners' runs. And, as noted, with the small-cap Russell 2000 index returning 25% in 2010, versus 14% for the S&P 500, it paid handsomely to have smaller companies on a focus list.

That makes Bank of America Merrill Lynch's victory especially notable. Steve Fleishman, chairman of the committee running its US 1 List, notes that the typically 25-to-30-name list was more large-stock-weighted last year. Its average member's stock-market value was a hefty $40 billion.

BofA Merrill's top five performers in the second half were auto maker Ford (F), heavy-equipment producer Terex (TEX), wireless-communication specialist Qualcomm (QCOM; for more on the company, see Tech Trader), software giant Oracle (ORCL) and one little guy, Dick's Sporting Goods (DKS). Ford, whose earnings disappointed investors Friday, is off the list now.

The list profited, Fleishman adds, partly from the rising earnings at industrial and consumer-discretionary companies. One of the investment firm's newest picks is CSX (CSX), which it says has the lowest valuation of any major U.S. railroad and the potential to substantially boost its operating margin.

IN THE ONE-YEAR GAME, Wedbush's head of equities, Sheri Kaiserman, says that its 15-to-25-stock Best Ideas list benefited from stocks that doubled. Among them: OmniVision Technology (OVTI)—a supplier to Apple (AAPL)—and Coinstar (CSTR), whose coin-counting and redbox DVD-rental kiosks are in malls and supermarkets around the country. OmniVision is now off the Best Ideas list.

(In our previous one-year contest, Wedbush also got a big boost from sizable bets on a number of stocks that doubled.)

Wedbush's performance, even as it backed off a bit in the second half, was still boosted by its focus on favored sectors, such as retailing, technology and industrials. Though health-care stocks generally lagged behind many other groups last year, the California broker made the most of picks like ZOLL Medical (ZOLL), a maker of devices like defibrillators, which jumped 39% in 2010.

Recently, Kaiserman added Boeing (BA) to the list, as she says fundamentals in the commercial airline sector are improving and the jet maker should begin delivering its long-delayed Dreamliner by July or August.

Two contestants, McAdams Wright Ragen and New Constructs, nimbly traded in and out of the same stocks regularly to help performance. Says David Trainer, president of New Constructs: "We live in a market [where] stocks are pushed around all the time on non-fundamentals." Both brokers took advantage of that.

PAUL LATTA, the director of research at McAdams, adds that his 20-to-25-name list—which won the 2008-2010 contest, covering both a bear and bull market—picked up much of its power in 2009, with a "phenomenal run" from its consumer picks, ironically stocks that had hurt it in 2008.

Over the three years, the list has profited from selections such as Starbucks (SBUX), still on it, and Nordstrom (JWN) and Whole Foods (WFMI), both now removed. The list finished big in 2010 with stocks like Beckman Coulter (BEC), a medical and scientific instrument and test maker that was the subject of takeover interest.

Latta expects the stock market to benefit again this year from the lack of returns from alternative assets like bonds.

Elkan Scheidt, chairman of the Morgan Keegan focus list committee, says his portfolio has benefited from a multicapitalization approach, with big names like Apple and Union Pacific (UNP) and mid-caps like Global Payments (GPN), a provider of electronic transaction-processing services and the list's newest addition.

In its quarter that ended Nov. 30, profits at Global Payments, which relies on consumer spending, dropped 15%. But Scheidt expects its margins to improve, along with the global economy, and says that analysts' earnings estimates for the company eventually could prove to be too low. He's overweight industrials and technology, and underweight utilities, consumer staples and telecoms, but is looking to add energy names.

In six months, we'll tell you how this worked out.
